What is claimed to be the most unique farm in this country is situated in the fastnesses of the Ozark mountains, on Indian creek, five miles from Anderson, Mo. It is nothing more nor less than a rattlesnake ranch, and is managed by Miss Ahern, assisted by her sixteen-year-old brother. Brother and sister look after the business alone, though occasionally they hire an Indian or negro who is willing to take the risk of capturing rattlesnakes alive. The two now have about 600 snakes in their pits. The principal profits of this enterprise come from the extracting of poison from rattlesnakes. The poison is sold at fancy prices to doctors, chemists and others. They also have a large revenue from the sale of live reptiles to traveling shows and to museums, at the established rate of fifty cents a pound. A large, fat serpent usually brings several dollars. The smaller, poorer specimens are killed and their flesh is converted into rattlesnake oil, which has a steady sale at $1 an ounce.
